

Mishpatim: Do and Hear

As they stand at the foot of Mount Sinai, Moses reads aloud to the Israelites the laws of the covenant (many more than just the “Big Ten”). In one of the most well known phrases of the Torah, the people respond: na’aseh v’nishma, “We will do and we will hear” (Exodus 24:7). Doing precedes “hearing” or understanding; act comes before fact. Two words convey the essence of Jewish faith.

But even more instructive than their content is the consensus with which they are spoken. Rabbi Lord Jonathan Sacks notes that this is the third time the people have assented to the covenant—and the first that they’ve changed their tune. In both prior instances, their response is unanimous: “All the people answered as one, saying, ‘All that GOD has spoken we will do (na’aseh)!’” (19:8); “all the people answered with one voice, saying, ‘All the things that GOD has commanded we will do (na’aseh)!’” (24:3). When it comes to doing, all are in agreement (more or less). Not so with hearing; each hears God’s voice in his or her own way.

Such is also an article of Jewish faith. Judaism is famously non-dogmatic. Perhaps the only tenet agreed upon is the sanctity of disagreement. Mahloket l’shem shamayim, “argument for Heaven’s sake,” is both a treasured pastime and a sacred value. Our devotion is expressed not in blind conformity but in questioning and challenging—with reverence for God and for each other as created in God’s image.

Na’aseh v’nishma, then, is not an affirmation but an exhortation: the only way we will hear each other is if we first do together. Shabbat is the perfect place to start.

Shabbat Shalom.
